37th International Postgraduate Course on Environmental Management for Developing and Emerging Countries (EM 37)

This 6-month course covers environmental management as an integrated interdisciplinary field. Therefore a broad range of topics is offered. The curriculum is organized in modules comprising issues of global sustainable development, environmental governance, environmental security, environmental economics and accounting, environmental awareness and public participation, applied ecology and ecosystem management, conservation of biodiversity, water management, recycling and waste management, energy for sustainable development, environmental assessment and environmental management systems, cleaner production and products and eco-efficiency, sustainable mobility, sustainable tourism as well as rural and urban land use planning. To provide survival knowledge of the German language a crash course is part of the programme. The lectures are held by professors of Technische Universität Dresden as well as experts from various national and international institutions.

A multitude of excursions to protected areas, industrial plants, public utilities for energy, water supply, waste water treatment, as well as waste recycling and disposal plants, environmental agencies and administrations etc. round off the course. They illustrate environmental problems and give ideas of successfully applied integrated environmental management practices. Participants are required to carry out a profound research on a specific environment related subject and present the results of this research in a symposium at the end of the course.

Objectives:

Participants acquire the ability to develop interdisciplinary strategies for sustainable development and to take appropriate measures for an environmental protection that takes ecological, socio-economic and cultural aspects into account.

Target Groups:

This course is particularly designed for decision-makers of public administration both at national and local level requiring an overall-competence in environmental matters. To gain the optimum from this training course, a first university degree (BA, BSc, e.g.) is absolutely indispensable.

Award:

Participants having successfully completed this course are awarded a Diploma of Environmental Management.

Allowance:

Euro 450.- per month, sufficient to cover all basic living expenses during the course and additional allowances of Euro 100.- in January to settle in, as well as Euro 150.- in July to send home books, etc.

Duration: 14 January - 15 July 2014

General Aspects

All courses are jointly organized and sponsored by:

- United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP);
- United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO);
- Federal Ministry for the Environment, Nature Conservation and Nuclear Safety (BMU), Germany;
- Federal Environmental Agency (UBA), Germany;
- Technische Universität Dresden (TU Dresden), Germany.

Candidates selected by the International Steering Committee are awarded a fellowship granted by the Federal Ministry for the Environment, Nature Conservation and Nuclear Safety, Germany.

Each fellowship includes:

- A non-re-routable, economy return air ticket from a major airport in the country of residence to Dresden;
- Accommodation in a single study bedroom with telephone and computer, private shower, kitchenette with cooking utensils and refrigerator;
- Registration and tuition fees for the course;
- Health and accident insurance;
- Allowance according to the duration of the course, but sufficient to cover all basic living expenses.

All courses will be held in English. Therefore, a good command of the English language is a prerequisite for attending the programme. The preferable age of participants is between 25 and 45 years. Participants must possess valid travel documents. Immediately after being awarded a stipend they should contact the German Embassy to obtain the necessary visa. The visa application procedure may take up to 10 weeks.

Applications for any of the above courses have to reach the course secretariat by 1st June 2013.
